

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Comedy of Conscience

A Comedy of Conscience

I

THE friends of Serena Vernon said that she was a spinster by choice; she herself declared that nature had elected her to be a maid; but Cousin John Winterbourne said: "It is a profession with Serena."

She spoke of herself as settled for life, and as being thirty years of age. Her face and figure were as frank in representing her as any age a man in love might choose to set. Prophetic wisdom must have given her the name Serena, and considerate fate had so far done nothing to contradict the calmness of a life free from stormy fortunes.

Serena lived tranquilly in her own house at Denham, and contrived to show a fair front to the world on an income so modest that it would have puzzled even those who knew her best to comprehend how she was able to give those delightful little dinners, which, to tell the truth, were somewhat rare, but entirely perfect of their kind. She was neat in her ways, but not too accurate; and in her dress, as in her housekeeping, was somewhat of a mystery to her acquaintance. But, as her friend Mrs. Clare once remarked, a large supply of old lace and unfailing good taste will really accomplish wonders. She had both the lace and the taste, and declared that she disliked competitive exhibitions in dress.

As a man I dare not go further in an effort to explain what was only a part of the mysterious attractiveness of a life and ways which were always efficient and never in excess. She once said to a friend that if a woman of thirty were worth looking at, to be dressed as if she were forty was good policy. In fact she never did consider questions of policy, but was apt at times to make delicately humorous statements such as that I have quoted.

Miss Vernon was a quietly active member of what she spoke of as the Church, meaning the Episcopal Church, and had an unconfessed weakness for bishops, and for the clergy in general, especially if they were of the High-Church party.

A small greenhouse and a half-acre of ground took up a good deal of her time, and many a man going down the green lane in June paused to watch the tall woman in gray, in her wide hat, with basket and scissors, busy among the fast-coming roses. Although a reader with wide sympathies and eager curiosity, she read only such books as she could afford to buy, or such as were sent her by John Winterbourne; for, being generally reticent, she was shy of explaining that she disliked to handle the books of public libraries because of being distressingly imaginative as to where and in what hands they had been.

She was, as you may have guessed, a gentlewoman, and possessed manners which, like her dress, were neat and free from any over-anxious desire to please. She kept a cook and an antique maid, but she felt that she was not yet old enough to allow herself the society of a cat. Her only living relative, Cousin John Winterbourne, managed her small property, and at times gave her advice, which she often asked and rarely took. When ill, which was not often, she went to bed, sent for her other male friend, Dr. Saffron, and treated his prescriptions as she did her cousin's advice. She was intelligent, but not intellectual.

Her nearest female friend was Mrs. Clare, who had come through the storms of an ill-matched marriage into the port of a determined and well-endowed widowhood with two boys. Miss Vernon was extremely fond of children, and a critical male acquaintance once remarked that "but for the widow's boys Serena would have married a clergyman. These boys were a buffer between Serena and marriage." Miss Vernon said the remark was not true and certainly was not nice.

I should add that unobservant people who talked for the first time with Miss Vernon thought her reserved and not very interesting. Indeed, most of the many men who admired the grace of her rather tall and quite perfect figure were apt to qualify their praise with the statement that she was cold.

She possessed one talent, which she kept for herself and three or four friends. She sang admirably, and the mechanic who paused at evening to listen went on his way homeward touched as by a charm of sweetness. She underrated her skill, and never sang elsewhere than in her own house.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE.

This quiet, pleasant life was kept in order by a delicately adjusted conscience. It ran along smoothly until the singular event took place which I have now to relate.

II

SERENA had long felt that her little drawing-room required new curtains. Twice she had saved the money needed, and twice had given it away to assist a mission to the Montana Indians, this being her favorite form of charity. Now, however, a small lot of unimproved ground had been sold, and she felt free to indulge her long-postponed desire. Accordingly, she went to the great city a few miles away, and, being hard to please, filled her little hand-bag with patterns to be considered at home, dropped into it her purse, which contained the money she had meant to use for the curtains, and took a trolley-car to return.

Miss Vernon was mildly interested as to the lives and ways of people not of her own social type, and in the brightly lighted car were many such, as it was now after dusk, and all who worked were returning to their homes.

A man who sat opposite caught her eye. He was large, coarsely featured, and had a rough, red wart on his cheek. He wore a huge shirt-pin and a glittering ring, which were, as she concluded, paste.

"A man who sat opposite caught her eye."

People got in and went out. She opened her purse to pay for her ticket of transfer, replaced it in her bag, and lifted a child to her lap. Presently the man gave his seat to a thin woman encumbered with a basket. Miss Vernon said to herself that her judgment of the man needed modification, and made mental note of her too hasty conclusion as uncharitable. As others on her side of the car left it, she moved a little, and said courteously, "There is room here." He replied, "Thank you, ma'am," and sat down.

When she reached home she went into her small library, brought out of a closet a large sheet of white wrapping-paper, and, emptying her patterns upon it, began to consider them. Presently, surprised to miss her purse, she searched her pocket, and, failing to find it, knew at once that the overdressed fellow-passenger at her elbow was the richer by thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, a luck-penny of 1798, and a receipt for caramel custard. Much annoyed, she shook her bag, and was amazed to see drop out a huge gold ring in which was set a shining stone. She was not what her friend Mrs. Clare described as an exclamatory person, but now she said: "Gracious goodness! How absurd! The paste ring that man wore! Cousin John will say — yes, he will say, ‘That comes, Rena, of your confounded way of being aggressively civil.’ He did say that once, and now he will call this a mutual theft. I can always tell what John will say. It must have slipped off the man’s finger.”

✓ A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

All this was said aloud in a low tone. Then Miss Vernon rose and rang the bell.

“Fetch me hot water and soap and a finger-bowl.”

When thus provided, she washed the ring with scrupulous care, and, having dried it, put it on her finger. It must have been worn as a thumb-ring, she thought. She had heard that rings were thus worn in Germany. It was fit for the finger of a giant.

Finally, having set down the date in her diary with a memorandum of the facts, the comic aspect of this exchange of property overcame her. She had paid rather dear for a paste stone in a sham-gold setting. She laughed heartily, wishing she could have seen the face of the pickpocket when he discovered his loss. After this she locked up the ring in her desk and rang for tea.

III

IN the evening, after dinner, Miss Vernon settled promptly on the pattern she liked best, and with dismay remembered that the money needful to buy her curtains was lost. How shabby the old ones looked ! She went back to her volume of Pusey's sermons, and resolutely dismissed the matter from her thoughts.

When abed and about to glide tranquilly into slumber, there arose in her mind a sudden and amazing reflection. What if the stone were not paste? What if it were a diamond? This absurd notion was fatal to sleep; not until the dawn appeared did she forget it in slumber. At breakfast it troubled her until she concluded to settle the matter. With this in view, she returned to the city, and walked to the shop of a jeweler where she was well known. Mr. Weldon, one of the partners, showed her into a little room and gave her a seat at a small table on which lay a large square of black velvet.

Miss Vernon said, "I have here a stone lately come into my possession. Kindly tell me if it has any value."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"Any value!" he exclaimed.
"Any value, Miss Vernon? It is a diamond."

"A diamond? Are you sure?"

"Certainly."

"Then it must have some value. Is it a good stone?" Miss Vernon had a not uneducated fondness for precious stones.

"It is a white diamond of perhaps two and a half carats, worth about eight hundred dollars. If it were blood-orange it would be worth six or seven thousand. Diamonds differ. Just now the taste is for color. I would suggest re-setting."

"No; kindly put it in a box."

He screwed the glass on to his

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

The ring is not mine.

I have it. I did not steal it.

It was not given to me. The man robbed himself. He will never come for it.

What shall I do with it? Oh, dear! what will John say? I cannot sell it, because it is not mine. I cannot return it to that rascal, because it may not be his. I hate to ask advice. Now I must. I will ask my rector, and Helen Clare, and Cousin John.

IV

SERENA knew at what hour in the afternoon she would find the Rev. Angelo King in his sacristy. She was fairly inclined toward High-Church ways, but on the subject of confession had declined to follow her clerical adviser. Once she had hurt his feelings by saying: "I will confess once for all, Mr. King, that I do not like confession."

The Rev. Angelo, who liked to

be called Father King, was not of ascetic build, and, although he fasted honestly, found himself more and more of cherubic figure as life went on. Now, as she entered, he was fully prepared by Serena's grave looks for a confession. He was disappointed when she displayed the diamond and related her scruples and difficulties, but he felt that this was at least an advance toward that emptying of a contrite soul to which he so earnestly desired to bring this fair sinner.

The sinner, observing his serious face and medieval attitude, said, smiling: "This is not an ecclesiastical confession. I have done no

“Have you never entertained the idea of keeping the ring?”

“No.”

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

wrong; I want to avoid doing wrong."

He replied gravely: "Have you never entertained the idea of keeping the ring, which is not your own, and is not that sin?"

Miss Serena thought this uncalled for, and was not to be so easily trapped. "Yes, but one has to entertain many thoughts about a matter so hard to dispose of. One may entertain a thought, Mr. King, and not give it much to live on."

The rector did not like this trifling with serious matters. Miss Serena was inwardly pleased with her jest, and was sorry the audience was manifestly unappreciative.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Mr. King was silent a moment, and then said: "Why not give the money to the church? We need only seven hundred for our new reredos, for the rest we already have."

"But pardon me," said Serena. "You first remind me that the diamond is not mine, then you venture to suggest that I sin in considering it mine, and at last you advise me to give away what is not mine."

"True, quite true; but the church—" Then he paused. Clergymen get the habit of not being interrupted and of seeing only one side of a question. He added foolishly: "You have told me your doubts and confessed thoughts which you feel to be wrong."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"Bless me! Mr. King, I did not confess in your sense. I do not want absolution until I feel the need of it. I cannot give what is not mine."

"Pardon me," he replied. "I may have been hasty, but you must do something with this ring. The man will never seek to recover it. The church might agree to repay the value of it if ever it is asked for. This should put you at ease."

"But, Mr. King, suppose that I do this and the man were to come and say, 'I am here to ask for my ring.' The church would say, 'It is sold.' He might say it was a valued heirloom, and where should I be, and you? I should have led you into the sin I desire to avoid for myself."

Upon this Miss Vernon rose. The Rev. Angelo also stood, but felt, as he looked up at Miss Vernon's five feet eight of graceful figure, that a foot added to his own height might have victoriously emphasized his spiritual counsel.

Miss Vernon said, "I thank you, but I cannot take your advice. Good-by," and went out disappointed mentally and morally in her rector.

V

THE next day found Miss Vernon in her cousin John's sitting-room, waiting for his return from luncheon at his club. Miss Serena put up her glass, and, moving about, surveyed the room with the curiosity with which an unmarried woman always inspects a bachelor's belongings. There were guns and salmon-rods in apparently useless number. A row of fly-books rewarded her with charming colors. Numberless journals were there—enviably printed British quarterlies, the French reviews, all manner of illustrated papers, with books on science, art, sport, and a few French novels. Cousin John shot ducks in winter, or snipe and partridges, and wound up with tarpon-fishing; had a brief season of idleness, then killed salmon in June, and went to Scotland for the grouse in August. He read, as she knew, omnivorously.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

She observed with unexplained regret that the room was beautifully clean.

At last Miss Serena, having ended her inspection, settled herself in one of a half-dozen tempting easy-chairs, picked up the nearest book (a French novel), and fell upon a rather astonishing scene. A moment later the door opened and Cousin John appeared. He was a perfectly dressed man of thirty-eight, well built, and sturdy from out-of-door life.

“Good heavens! Rena,” he laughed, glancing at the book, “you won’t have a moral left.”

Serena blushed. “I was about to lay it down, John.”

“You will not if you read it long. The devil is apt to be amusing, especially the French devil. What can I do for you? I go to Currituck to-morrow, but if—”

“Oh, it is only a little advice

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

that I want. Now kindly listen to me."

Then she told the story of the ring, and, ending, put it on the table. He picked it up laughing. "I have heard nothing so good for years. The ravens were around this time, Rena. What a windfall!"

"Windfall! I do not understand you."

"Certainly. You never will allow me to help you; but just now—" he hesitated—"let me add a few hundred. I should waste it at Aix or Monte Carlo. Then you will have sixteen hundred and can have that summer in English cathedrals. I congratulate you."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"I cannot take your money, John, and I am simply amazed that you could believe that I, of all people, would spend this man's money on self-indulgence."

"Now, Rena, what stuff! He stole that from some one, the scamp."

"I suppose so ; it is not mine."

"Great Scott! To whom does it, will it, shall it belong?"

"Not to me. I can't give away what is not mine."

"Whose is it, Rena?"

"The man's, I suppose, or some one's from whom he stole it."

"Then advertise: 'On return of a porte-monnaie with thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, a penny of

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Washington, date 1798, and a receipt for pickled doughnuts — ”

“Caramel custard, John.”

“Well, no matter — ‘the owner will return to the person bringing it back a diamond ring, value eight hundred dollars; no questions asked. No clergymen need apply.’”

“You are rather exasperating, John. But what am I to do?”

“Why not keep the ring until something turns up?”

“How can I keep it? Nothing will turn up — nothing. It is a dreadful responsibility, and I never had one before since — ” and Serena colored.

“Yes, I know, dear Rena, since long ago you said, ‘John —’”

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"Please not."

"Well, I believe I promised, and we have been fast friends ever since."

"Thank you," she said gently, "but do help me a little."

"Well, pitch it into the river."

"That would be waste, and you do not mean it."

"Rena, it is you who are exasperating. Spend it on Indian missions."

"I thought of that, but it is not mine. Can't you see my trouble?"

"You have too much imagination."

"No matter what I do, John, I shall end by robbing some one."

"He will never know, Rena."

"John!"

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"Well, spend it, and leave the rascal with a wart a legacy in your will — eight hundred; that ought to settle it."

"Nothing settles it. If you had even an improper fraction of a conscience, John, you would feel as I do."

"A fraction of an improper conscience. I like that. Damn it, Rena, you are incredible."

"John! I am sorry I bothered you. Good-by."

"But, Rena!"

"No, I must go," and she went out. As he conducted her to the elevator, she turned smilingly, and said: "John, I have been wanting to say that for two days."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"What?"

"The exclamation you used just now."

"Gracious, Rena, what a dear you are! Good-by. I will send you a lot of ducks."

As she walked to the station, more than ever perplexed, she said: "Well, if nothing else turns up I can advertise; not just John's absurd way. The ring is the man's, not mine. Oh, if I could only see him! Now there is nothing left except Helen Clare. A woman will see this miserable business from my side."

VI

IN the late afternoon of an October day she walked a mile to her friend's house. The widow made her welcome; the children were dismissed, and, as they sat down, her friend said:

"Serena, what is wrong? You look worried."

"Oh, I am so perplexed, dear. I really cannot see my way clear."

"And his name, dear Rena?"

"I wish I knew!"

"What on earth do you mean?"

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"Mean! It is n't a man. Yes, it is a man."

Miss Serena was nearer a fit of hysterics than she had ever been in all her placid life. Her friend took her hand and said very quietly, "Tell me, my love."

Then Serena lifted her dark-gray eyes and told how she had lost her purse and got a diamond worth eight hundred dollars.

Mrs. Clare exclaimed: "How delicious! Have you it with you?"

"Yes; I am afraid to leave it at home: Here it is."

Mrs. Clare inspected this queer find. "What a monster, dear! You will have to have it reset before you can wear it."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"Wear it, Helen! Wear that creature's stone—his diamond! Think, dear, of the horror of it!"

"Upon my word, Rena, if all the big diamonds could talk there would be some tales to hear. A diamond cannot perish, and what queer scenes they must have beheld—what women, what men! How many times that diamond may have caused murder!"

"What horrible imaginations, Helen!"

"Or turned the scale against a woman's honor."

"My dear Helen!"

"And yet it is pure and beautiful and innocent; one might write the biography of a diamond."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Serena said: "You might, dear, but if you were as frank on paper as in speech your story would never get into any of the magazines."

"It is your own fault, Rena. It is you who set me going. Did ever any one tell you, Rena, that you have more imagination than is good for you?"

"No, not precisely that; but really, dear, to be serious, this diamond troubles me. It is not mine. What is to be done with it?"

"I will tell you," cried Mrs. Clare, joyously.

"I knew you would."

"Such a piece of good fortune! Sell it; sell it at once. I have always wanted to see you in one of Worth's best gowns; you have such a lovely figure."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Upon this Serena burst into tears.

"What is the matter?"

"Oh, Helen, to tempt me to use what is not mine! How could you! And I have been so harassed."

Then Mrs. Clare saw that it was indeed serious, and, being a woman of sympathetic turn, and a dear lover of this friend, said: "Yes, I see; of course not. Quite impossible! How stupid of me! But, Rena, what do you yourself think?"

"I don't think; every one asks that. I want advice, advice."

"Well, suppose you were to get a detective and ask him to find your man, and then give him his ring."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"But what if he stole it! It may not be his ring."

Mrs. Clare felt inclined to use something like the exclamation employed by Cousin John. She refrained, and went on to state that perhaps to advertise the ring cautiously, asking for proof of ownership, might answer.

Now Serena saw a little light, and said eagerly: "Why, yes; how dull men are! The setting has the French hall-mark. No one could guess that. It would serve to find the real owner."

"Or the thief," said Mrs. Clare. "He would know."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"I forgot that; I really should not care. But I do not think he would come for it. He would consider it a trap. I must think about it."

Mrs. Clare had exhausted her wisdom, or did not care to suggest that the thief might send some one else to claim and identify the ring. They had another cup of tea, Miss Vernon assuring her friend that she was the only person who had given her practical advice. As to the rector she was reticent, being still a little sore. Cousin John had been simply absurd. "And, in fact," she said, "Helen, John is always a little—well—embarrassed. No; I should not say just that, dear, but unnatural. I think it grows on him."

Mrs. Clare looked up from a futile effort to balance a teaspoon on the lip of a tea-cup, and said: "Isn't that rather droll of a man of the world like Mr. Winterbourne? Do you know, Rena, I sometimes think—I mean, is it not even yet possible that —"

"No, Helen, it is not. Pardon my interruption; and, dear, you are rather fond of going back to this somewhat aged subject. Suppose we drop it. John and I made a friendly contract seven years ago. I am satisfied with my own life, and as for John, he is a confirmed bachelor."

"That is a curable malady, my dear Rena."

Here Miss Vernon let fall her handkerchief, and recovered it, but not very promptly, feeling, as she sat up, that her tendency to blush on slight occasion was a habit which seemed to be difficult to overcome. She said, with a smile: "Let us return to our diamond, Helen. I will think it over afresh. I wish I had asked John not to mention it. He evidently thought it an amusing tale. I do not."

"But apart, dear Rena, from your quite excessive scruples (oh, they are excessive), it is a thing

any one might be apt to relate.
I should."

"But you will not."

"No, of course not. Ah, here are the boys."

VII

MISS VERNON walked homeward in the twilight, feeling that in the multitude of counselors there is not always wisdom. Were they right, after all? Had she dealt with her conscience so as to make it useless in as small an affair as this? Or were these people all wrong? And what should she do?

Just what she had feared did happen. Cousin John wrote:

DEAR RENA: I have your note, but, unluckily, I could not resist telling the story to a man at the club last night. Upon my word, you are quite needlessly sensitive. Lock up the ring and wait until I come back in November. Time is a good counselor. In a week or two, if you drop the matter, something will turn up.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Yours always,

J. W.

P.S. As soon as I heard from you I wrote the man a note and asked him not to tell the story; but who could resist such a comic opportunity? Pardon me.

John assured her that something would turn up. Something did turn up; several things turned up. After days of distracting thought Serena wrote in her diary:

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

At last I seem to see my way. I shall advertise. If in — months no one appears to claim the ring I shall feel free to use it for charity.

It will be seen that Miss Vernon was unable to set down the number of months. Twenty-one years of undisputed ownership make good a land claim, as she knew. This did not require an immediate decision. She sent her maid with a carefully considered advertisement to the office of the "Day-Book," a journal which she took chiefly because the name pleased her, and because it had no illustrations and no Sunday issue. This was her advertisement:

Found, October 9, a diamond ring.
Absolute proof of ownership required.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Letter to S. V., at this office, must accurately describe setting and fix value.

Here Serena hesitated, and finally added:

No reward will be asked.

With a mind now at ease, Miss Vernon invited Dr. Saffron and Mrs. Clare to dine two days later, and in the interval gave up her mind to the study of an English church controversy as to the use of incense, and whether the number of candles on the altar should be odd or even. This, with what she meant for a triumphant menu, occupied her for a time. The next day letters began to come. It was like the answers to a newspaper charade. Before the day of the dinner she had three hundred and twenty-one letters. All made more or less elaborate guesses at plain gold, enamel, or pearl setting, and so on endlessly. All tried a shot at the value of the ring, and several came near enough. On the afternoon of her dinner she went to the city to get chocolate bonbons for dessert. Returning at dusk in the trolley, she heard two shop-girls talking.

"It must be the same. Just look here. Read that. The 'Herald' has two just lovely articles about it. You had n't seen it?

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Why, where have you been? Everybody 's talking about it, and in the 'Day-Book' there in an advertisement of the ring; it must be the same ring. Seven of us wrote letters to describe it—just for fun."

"And suppose you had hit on the right description?" said her companion.

"Oh, that would be awful fun; but law! one could n't take it."

"Oh, no. The thief, he might describe it; but he 'd be afraid."

"Yes, but he might find out the house and burgle it. If I was her I 'd be dreadful scared. Think I 'd move."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Serena Vernon grew cold with anticipative fear. "This is John's doing; how could he!"

"The advertisement does n't give her name," said girl number one. "I wish I was her. I 'd soon settle it, and I would n't be goose enough to cackle all over creation. Oh, the 'Herald' says her name is — oh, I forget. It's a real romantic name, like it was out of a novel — oh, Serena Vernon. I 'll lend you the paper. Don't lose it. Here 's my station."

Miss Vernon sat up, a representative statue of all the outraged modesties of a retiring gentlewoman. "Oh, John," she murmured, "I hate you. What shall

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

I do?" She bought the "Herald," and read with increasing misery, in huge head-lines :

ROMANTICALLY AMAZING INCIDENT

WAS HE REALLY A PICKPOCKET?

WHAT WILL SHE DO WITH IT?

A gentleman sits by a lady in a trolley. He is said to have stolen her porte-monnaie from her bag, and in doing so dropped in it a diamond ring valued at three thousand dollars. Loss of purse discovered on her return home. Ring found at bottom of her bag.

The heroine of this adventure is Miss Serena Vernon, a lady about forty-one years of age, well known in society at Denham. We hope to print her photograph to-morrow, with further particulars. Was he a thief? If so, the advertisement in yesterday's "Day-Book" may be an effort to induce the man to call for his ring. A rather feeble feminine device; or is there some tender sentiment in the background?

Serena was half a mile past her home when she ceased re-reading this agreeable article and left the car. What could she do? She rang her bell, and, entering, found a young man on a chair in the little hall. He rose.

"Miss Vernon, I believe?"

"I am Miss Vernon. What is it?"

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"I represent the 'Daily Critic.' I want a few particulars in regard to the astounding incident of the diamond ring."

"Sir," said Miss Vernon, "this is an impertinence. What have you to do with my private affairs?"

"Then it was true? Thank you, ma'am. Any further facts would gratify the public."

For a moment the well-bred gentlewoman was struck dumb with astonishment. "Will you be so good as to leave my house?" and she approached the hall door.

"Yes, ma'am. Then you don't board. You live alone."

"Leave my house."

"But, ma'am, is it true that the gentleman is known to you? Or is it true that he has returned the purse and only kept a — ”

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

“Will you go!” cried Miss Vernon.

“But, ma’am — excuse me, ma’am, the public is interested. Why not give us the real story and let us contradict that nonsense in the ‘Herald.’”

“Will you go!” said Miss Vernon, “or, or —” She was at her wits’ end. “Shall I, must I call the dog? Towser! Towser!” she cried.

She had a fine fear of dogs, big or little, and, needless to say, possessed none.

“Certainly, ma’am; sorry to have intruded.”

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

“Well, go, then.”

Never before in her life had she been so abrupt to man or woman. He went out, and paused under the next electric light to make a note of her apparent age and costume.

VIII

SERENA entered her little library, and, throwing herself into a chair, sat twisting her gloves, angry and miserable. "Oh for a man!" she exclaimed.

Here she was still sitting when Mrs. Clare and Dr. Saffron appeared. Serena, hastily regaining her composure, rose as her friends entered, and excused herself for having been late in returning from the city. The doctor, in turn, apologized. He had not replied to her

[64]

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

note of invitation until two hours ago, as a consultation had called him away, and he had been absent three days. Her invitations to dine answered themselves. When were they ever refused? There was a certain harmony in the dress, face, and figure of this complacent little gentleman, whose self-assurance carried everywhere a comforting sense of belief in his competence to deal with all human ills. An underestimate of the difficulty of the most difficult of professions, and an overestimate of Roderick Saffron, had served, with rather too sympathetic manners, to win for him a large practice and to make of him a general favorite. Children liked him ; mothers adored him ; and if men liked or trusted him less completely it was of small moment in general practice, where it is the verdict of women which decides the fortunes of a doctor.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Mrs. Clare glanced at her friend's half-mended disorder of face, and said : " Don't hurry, dear. I will go up-stairs with you. The doctor will excuse me."

" Certainly," he replied.

They had been gone a minute when the maid appeared and told the doctor that two persons, men, were in the entry, insisting on seeing Miss Vernon. Would he speak to them? She had said her mistress was engaged. They said they would wait. They would not go away. The doctor went out, and in a few minutes came back apparently amused. When the ladies returned, he said :

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

“ My dear Miss Serena, we have had two reporters here. I saw them. They had some supremely ridiculous tale about a diamond; one man wanted your photograph. I simply told them the tale they had heard was not true; it was most absurd. And you may imagine what I said as to a photograph. I have not the honor to possess one myself. They said the story should be contradicted to-morrow, and went away.”

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"They went away!" said Miss Vernon. "And you told them it was not true—not true!"

"Yes; they were a trifle obstinate, but these fellows are so used to being received with, may I say, rudeness and disgust, that a little civility always disarms them. You may be quite at your ease. They will contradict the story."

"But I am not at all at my ease, and it is true," said Serena. Whereupon she related the facts to her astonished physician. "What will they think of me?"

"Well," he said, "I have innocently fibbed for you, and a very good thing, too. But pardon me if I ask what you mean to do about the ring. Had I been at home you no doubt would have done me the honor to ask my advice."

Mrs. Clare smiled unworded comment. "Give it now," she said.

The doctor was by habit inclined to learn what form of advice would be agreeable before venturing to restate it in his own words. He hesitated, and then said: "To know what you have thought or done in this strange affair would reinforce my decision with knowledge."

"It is too late," said Mrs. Clare. "Our friend has advertised for the owner of the diamond."

"I could have predicted Miss Vernon's course from my long acquaintance with her character."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Mrs. Clare was delighted. She, too, had been silently predictive, but not as to her friend.

"The thief will not come," added the doctor.

"Oh, I hope he will," said Serena.
"No, I hope he will not. I want the real owner to claim it. I have had a bushel of letters. Suppose no one comes? What am I to do?"

"There is our village hospital," ventured the doctor.

"You are as bad as my rector," said Serena, smiling.

"Let us wait a little," said Mrs. Clare. She still had hopes of seeing her friend in one of Worth's gowns. "At the worst, Rena," she added, "you can give it to me. I will put it away for Harry's wife, and as he is now only six years old, the question would be ethically settled by the time he is, say, twenty-eight."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"How ingeniously proper, how judicial!" said the doctor.

"Thanks, Helen," said Serena; "there is something in that. I think Solomon must have owed his wisdom to the numberless ladies of his household."

"Yes, if wisdom be the child of experience," laughed Mrs. Clare.

The doctor made a mental record of Miss Vernon's compliment to the wits of woman for future use, when it might be desirable to explain his suave compliance with the views of some too resolute mother.

“Read no papers for a week,” said Helen Clare. “That is my advice.”

“The ‘Churchman’ or the ‘Guardian’ might be safe,” said the doctor.

Serena smiled, and they went out to dinner.

IX

THE dinner was an unusual success, and Miss Vernon awakened next morning enough at ease to read a dozen more letters with some sense of amusement.

The next day two women reporters called, and an evening paper printed as a portrait of Miss Vernon a full-length of a variety actress, twice divorced.

A little later, the cook was offered a dollar for particulars of Miss Vernon's life. Serena began to think of moving.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

In the afternoon the rector called, and how soothing, how satisfactory it was that the "Globe" had contradicted the extravagant statements of the "Herald" !

Miss Vernon was unable to feel quite satisfied, for, after all, the story was true. When asked by the Rev. Angelo King how it came to be denied by one of her own household, she explained the doctor's share in the matter, the rector interjecting at intervals, "Really! Really!" At last he said: "How painful to have been put in the position of appearing to sustain a deviation from truth!"

Miss Vernon felt that she was overstating her disapproval. She held in the background behind her conscience a feeling that now the thing would cease to excite public comment. She said as much.

"The doctor has clearly bungled," said the rector — "in fact, has assumed to know what he did not. But, my dear Miss Serena, if Dr. Saffron had a too childlike confidence in himself, we know that out of the mouths of babes cometh wisdom." He was so well pleased with this that he repeated it for the benefit of Mrs. Clare, who came in as he spoke.

Serena saw his satisfaction at this use of biblical quotation. She did not like it, but was tardily amused, knowing that her rector greatly disliked the doctor. Mrs. Clare knew why, but had always laughingly declined to explain to Serena. After this they discussed the Montana mission, when the rector at last rose. He said: "Has a way opened to you—I mean about the diamond?"

She said, "No," but then apologized so gently for what she called her abrupt treatment of his advice that he went away seeing the reredos a little more distinctly.

Then for a time the papers ceased from troubling, the letters came no more, and there was a lull in the affair of the diamond ring. Serena put it in her strong box in the bank, and had additional bolts placed on her first-floor windows. The burglar still haunted her uncomfortably. Soon after, a letter came from a friend in Santa Barbara, which much annoyed her. She showed it and the clipping it inclosed to Mrs. Clare. On this Mrs. Clare asked her if she knew the game called Russian scandal. Serena had played it when young.

“Well, my dear, the newspapers play it all the time. It would seem easy to copy a paragraph accurately; but here you see what happens. This fine tale has gone over all the land, and this is the result.” She read aloud:

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

“A very beautiful Quaker lady in Durham, Pennsylvania, was followed into a car by a gentleman. He let fall into her bag a diamond ring valued at four thousand dollars. A romantic termination is probably to follow this unusual form of wooing. It is said he took her purse when he dropped his ring into her bag. Perhaps he wanted a gage d'amour.”—Santa Barbara Journal.

“Another account says the brooch — or was it a ring? — will reappear in the form of a reredos in the church at Durham, and that she has refused the gentleman and also refused to return his ring.

“Serena, that rector has been gabbling; observe the reredos.”

“Well,” said Serena, “it does

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

seem only too likely. Burn it, dear.
Men are all alike."

"They are all alike, are they?
Even John?"

"Yes, all. This is my new tea, Helen. Try it."

On Saturday, a week later, Miss
Vernon received a letter from Tampa, Florida.

DEAR RENA: The ducks were not at Currituck, and why I came hither I do not know, except that one must go somewhere. I have been eating humble-pie because of my folly, and, my dear cousin, it never agrees with me.
I have read those blank papers, and the denial, and the advertisement.
What a coil! I am sorry if, as is stated, you authorized the contradiction.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

It was not like you. And who is the reported Mr. Butterworth who was interviewed and represented you? I did not suspect you of this form of duplicity! Never ask a newspaper to say it has lied, or, except in politics, to say another paper has lied. My poor Rena, if I were to cowhide this fellow he would only contrive worse things, and would swear, what is true, that the main fact is correct; and, really, to lick a reporter for coarse-minded misuse of facts would be valueless, or involve a too chronic use of this ultimate resort. After all, I am the one to blame. I am coming back at once. Do not move further in the matter.

Your affectionate cousin,

JOHN.

"Well," said Serena, aloud, "if anything were needed to make it all seem worse, this would. First John talks, then my doctor talks, then my rector talks; and they think we gossip."

That night Serena wrote in her diary :

Yes, I do believe I have been wicked enough to want to have some one suffer for this outrage—some one besides poor, innocent me, who have lived in what Helen calls a cocoon of privacy. Alas! I think I might once have married, but the unpleasant publicity of it all seemed so shocking, and now I am affichéed like an opera-dancer. It does seem too atrocious. I shall never forgive you, John, never.

Miss Serena in all her gentle life had never so hated man or woman as to need to forgive. John was safe enough. The following Monday she wrote in her diary :

The local express brought a pile of late English journals. How thoughtful of John ! Also by mail came an article blue-penciled — why blue ? — from “Views and Reviews, a Journal in the Interest of the Past and the Future of the Ulterior Womanhood.” That seems elaborate. The article is on my diamond—I mean on what John calls the “Great Diamond Trust.”

“This curious story has its moral aspects. If the lady had not been so silly as to be needlessly civil to a man she would not have been in her present conscientious quandary.”

How does any one know that I have a conscience, or was civil, or am in a quandary?

The next heading is, "The Anti-Marriage League," and, by way of contrast, an advertisement of the "Company to Insure Permanence in the Marriage State."

Good gracious! it is needed. I suppose there would be an examination on looks, temper, and money. I thought to show it to John. I do not think I shall. It sounds too like John. I do not mean that he is not refined, Mem.: The use of a diary is a temptation to be foolish.

Tuesday. Delicious bunch of snipe from John, and a telegram. He is on his way North. What nonsense to wire! How easily one's language becomes debased! Mem.: To avoid this word.

X

ON Wednesday morning that which ever since the advertisement was unlooked for, but probable, did occur. As Serena turned into the lane which led to her house, a slight, quiet, well-dressed man crossed the street, took off his hat, and said: "I have the honor to address Miss Vernon?"

"That is my name, but if you are a reporter —"

"I am not, madam, a reporter. I am Charles Lytton of Sedgely,

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Alabama. I am the owner of the diamond which I see has been, must have been, the source of anxiety and annoyance. The newspapers have, I grieve to say —”

Miss Vernon was on her guard. The man's tones lacked that indefinable something in the way of inflection which should have gone with what seemed to be carefully chosen language — a little too careful; nor had he the accent of the South. She interrupted him.

“Come in,” she said, quite resolute, but also somewhat nervous.

He followed her into the library and cast a glance of swift survey about the room. They sat down, Serena near the bell.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"I lost, I should say my wife lost, this ring, her mother's marriage gift. It was stolen on a French steamer, the Gascoigne, last year. Of course it is very dear to me. You will pardon my emotion."

Serena pardoned the emotion, but reflected on the size of the departed Mrs. Lytton's finger.

"Here is the description of the ring," he continued; "I have written it out."

Serena read and re-read it. It was accurate. She was clear at once that either this was the true owner, or, as was probable, that he represented the thief. But how to be sure?

W. B. N. Y.

“And now, madam, . . . have the kindness to give me my ring.”

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"And now, madam," he said, not waiting for her decision, "have the kindness to give me my ring."

She made no reply except to look up and then once more to consider the memoranda. These were written on a rather soiled half-sheet of ruled note-paper. This caused Serena to have a prejudicial distrust of which she was conscious and a little ashamed. Time was now what she most wanted. She said: "It appears to be — I have no doubt it is all correct.¹ The ring is in the bank."

"I have to leave town to-day," he said. "If you will go with me

¹Diary: "This was not quite true. I am sorry I said it."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

to the bank you will add to my obligations."

Miss Vernon replied with calmness: "I fear that in so large a matter I must ask for further information, and, pardon me, for some personal identification."

Then he saw that he had lost the game. He rose. "I should think that needless. However, I will wait over two days" ("Why two?" thought Serena), "and on Friday will return with my friend Mr. Seeley, the cashier of the Mechanics' Trust. Will that answer? And may we set twelve o'clock? Do you know Mr. Seeley?"

"I do not," she returned. "I shall be here at that hour."

"I must leave at one forty-five.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Will you kindly have the ring ready?"

If he did not come the ring would be safe. If he did, Mr. Seeley, a well-known citizen, would be present, the man vouched for, and she relieved. At all events, John should be there. All this passed through her mind before she repeated, "Yes, the ring shall be here, and I shall be most pleased to get rid of it. Good morning"; and he went away.

A little later came Mrs. Clare, to whom Miss Vernon related the interview, adding: "And now, Helen, how does it strike you?"

"Was he possibly a reporter, a gossip burglar?"

"Goodness! Helen, no. I should prefer a real burglar. Tell me, dear, you do not think he was that; that would — ”

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

“No, I do not. But he will not come. Do you know Mr. Seeley, dear? I do.”

“No; but in any case John will be here.”

“Why is not John always here, or you there?”

“I wish you would not, Helen.”

“Would not what?”

“You know well enough.”

“You will marry him, Rena.”

“No, never.”

“Then he will marry you.”

“It is too late. I am — ”

“My dear, have the kindness to consult that oracle, the lookingglass. You dear, sweet, shy, silly creature! How pretty you are when you blush!"

"Don't, please."

"Well, as you like. I must go."

At dusk came a note from Mrs. Clare.

I have seen Frank Seeley. He does not know your man.

"I thought as much," said Serena. "Why did I not think of this? How clever she is!"

XI

WHEN John Winterbourne arrived next day, he said: "Come for a drive, Serena. Don't talk now. Get a warm wrap. My dog-cart is on the avenue."

When they were far out in the country, he said: "Here is an apology from that editorial scamp to whom my friend told the story. He regrets, etc.; will make it all right in to-morrow's paper. I said no, he must hold his tongue; that was all I asked."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"Thank you, John. That was right. I must have no more of it."

"Of course, Rena, the editor was out of town. He always is when these things happen."

"Are there no decent journals, John?"

"Certainly. The 'Day-Book' and the 'Episcopal Recorder.' Oh, others, too, Rena. Don't look so grave. What a glorious day! But what of the diamond?"

Then she told him of her latest interview. It was now his turn to look grave.

"Rena, the man came from your thief. He did not expect to succeed. He will not return on Friday, at least not at the time set.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

He wanted to be sure that you would have the ring in your house. I say, Rena, you have a spare room?"

"Yes."

"Will you take me in for a day or two?"

Rena hesitated for an instant, and said: "Yes, John, of course. But what is it? What do you fear?"

"I do not know. I will speak to the police."

"No; oh, no!"

"Why not?"

"He will think I set a trap for him."

"And why not?"

"But, John, it will be in the papers again, and I shall have to go to court, and more reporters will come, and, after all, I shall still have the ring, and there we are just where we began."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"Rena, you want a man to take care of you. You wear too tight shoes on your conscience. You are a moral tenderfoot."

"A what, John?"

"Too much conscience, Rena."

"You are right, I dare say—I mean about my conscience."

"Possibly it has had so little sin to attend to that it has become too—well, too concentrated."

"What nonsense, John!"

"Cousin Rena, are you past seeing the fun of the Diamond Trust?"

"Pretty nearly."

[97]

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"Best get all the amusement out of it you can."

"There is n't anything new, John, is there?" She was alarmed.

"No, only pure fun. I cut out a few paragraphs from Southern papers. Like to look at them, Rena?"

"No, I should not."

"But, Rena, there is one—just take the reins; they 'll go along."

"I shall do no such thing."

"Well, here it is. I forgot—stuck it in my waistcoat pocket."

Miss Vernon took it reluctantly, saying: "I shall read this and no more. Helen Clare says it is a dreadful thing to come into the changeless peace of life like mine.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

It was so prettily worded, but when she went on to say such an event was disheveling, that did seem to me an odd use of English."

"Rather," said John, touching up the leader. "Read it aloud. How could it have got so mixed up?"

Serena read:

"A well-known society woman in Rahway was in the habit of going to New York daily on a trolley. She observed a gentleman who was always on the same car with her. He watched her so constantly as to embarrass her, contriving always, soon or late, to sit beside her. On several occasions she found at the end of her journey that jewels had been placed in the reticule she carried.

[99]

One was a diamond worth a thousand dollars; once it was a pearl ring; once an opal ring. She is sure these were put in her bag by the gentleman above mentioned. When she ceased to travel on this line, every second day some jewel was left at the house by mail or by express. Miss Varnum ["Gracious!" exclaimed Serena, "Varnum!"] is the lady's name. Strangely enough, under this opulent persecution ["'Opulent' is a fine adjective, Rena," interposed John] Miss Varnum's nerves have given way, and she is now about to consult the distinguished neurologist, Dr. von Neuron.

“That is certainly worthy of the newspaper novelist,” said Serena. “It would be curious to see how

[100]

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

from the 'Herald's' horrid account it got by degrees to this."

"It gives one a certain disrespect for history, Rena. I won't ask you to read the others. They would curdle your young blood. Well, I will come on Friday, and, by the by, I had a day at Currituck. You will get your ducks this evening. Don't overcook them."

"As if I could allow such a thing, John!"

"I told Tom to leave with them a case of Corton Vieux. I have just got my importation. Don't drink it for two months."

"John, that kind of thing must stop. You know —"

"It never will stop."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"You nearly ran into that wagon."

"I did; it was your nonsense, Rena. You did not stir. You are the least nervous woman I ever drove."

"Do you drive many — many women?"

"Several," said John.

Serena was silent, and then said:

"How the leaves are falling!"

"Too fast," said John.

Serena meditated.

XII

JOHN'S bag came that evening, and the wine and the ducks. He followed them at noon, in time for luncheon, on Friday. No visitors appeared. In the afternoon he lighted a cigar and went out at the back of the house to think a little. Serena had begged him to smoke in her library. This was unusual. She rather liked the odor of tobacco, but entertained antique prejudices in regard to the habit, as her doctor knew to his postpran-

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

dial discomfort. John had two subjects for reflection. One he put aside. The other was answered in a measure by the revolver in his breast pocket. He walked on, keenly scrutinizing those who went by. About dusk he observed a large man under a slouched felt hat and in a loose cloak, a rather uncommon garment. He was smoking. He paused a moment opposite to Serena's lane, and then continued on his way. About half a block farther he crossed over, and, as John had lingered, they approached each other. John dropped his cigar behind him, and, holding a fresh one in his hand, paused, asking in his most civil way for a light. The other gave him his cigar without words. As John lighted his own, he let fall the stranger's cigar. On this he apologized profusely, and offered his open cigar-case. The man helped himself, and said, "Much obliged." As he secured a light from John's cigar, it was too dark to see well, but the illumination of the two bright tips lighted up a coarse face in flashes. The man had a large wart on his left cheek. John said, "You will find the cigar good," and moved on murmuring to himself: "We are to have two, then. Oh, Rena, your fear of wholesome publicity may prove to be a pretty business. A few policemen would — well, I think I can arrange it. And where is Mr. Lytton? This beats tarpon-fishing.” He made a long circuit and reëntered the house at the back door, throwing away his cigar.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

At six-thirty the door-bell rang, and the servant announced Mr. Lytton. Serena rose, and said under her breath, “Tell Mr. John after the man comes in.”

She was amazed to feel so tranquil. Was it John? Meanwhile Mr. Lytton in the hall reopened the street door so as to leave it slightly ajar, and a moment later was seated at the fire, while Serena listened for her cousin’s step on the stair. He had gone quietly down the back stairway, warned the women to keep the back door locked, and waited a moment.

Mr. Lytton said: "Mr. Seeley is out of town. I have come for the ring. I cannot consent, ma'am, to your delaying its return." His tone was peremptory.

Serena glanced at the half-closed door which led into the dining-room, and hearing no sign of John, became anxious, but, to her surprise, not at all alarmed. She had failed John once. He had never failed her. Mr. Lytton arose, looked into the back room, and returned without explaining his cautious inspection. At this moment the front door was heard to close gently. The thief of the trolley-car entered. Serena rose. The newcomer caught her by the wrist, and said: "Now, no nonsense, miss; I want my ring."

Serena was never timid in an emergency. She said: "Be so good as not to clasp my wrist so hard. I can't get away."

"Give me my ring!"

"It is not yours," she said boldly, "and I have not got it with me." She was very quiet, almost cool. John had it.

"Where is it?"

"That you will not know until you prove that you own it."

"You had best tell us, or —"

"I will die first."

"Both men were too old at the game to hesitate."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

At this moment the door was thrown open, and John cried out, "Hands up," the gleaming steel barrel of a revolver emphasizing the order. Both men were too old at the game to hesitate. They obeyed him, and Serena fell into a chair, not too scared to fail of admiration of the handsome figure in a velvet lounging-jacket. Said John, "A single shot will call the police, but I never miss."

Serena was amused, even at this critical moment, at the absurdity of the two scamps with their hands in the air.

"Move a little nearer, you fellows," said John. "So, that will do; now we will talk. Be so good as to remember that a shot will cripple one of you and call the officers. Now answer me. Where did you get that ring? You, the big chap."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"It is mine."

"Stuff! Don't trifle. Answer. If you tell the truth and I can prove it, you may go. By the way, you other fellow, I do not want you. You may go; but hands up and shut the door after you."

The gentleman in question made no reply except to obey. He closed the library door behind him, and was wise enough to carry off Serena's seal jacket and John's overcoat. The front door shut clamorously.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"And now," said John, "I want to know. Don't stir. Keep up your hands — higher. It is a trifle fatiguing. Moses found it so."

"Oh, John!"

"Be quiet, Rena. This gentleman has the floor. Come, now, out with it. The truth or the penitentiary."

"You can't prove nothing."

"What about that pocket-book?"

"And my luck-penny?"

"Do, Rena, keep quiet."

"Will you let me go if I own up square?"

"I will."

"How shall I be sure?"

"Damn it, you fool! You can't help telling, and I have promised. You have got to trust the inconceivable probability of having to do with a gentleman."

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"Well, I stole it in New York. It was part of the plunder in the big Schmitt burglary last May."

"Who has the proof?"

"The police in New York has the description. Now let me go."

"Not much. Here, Rena, write. I will dictate :

"POLICE HEADQUARTERS, NEW YORK:

"Found, set in a gold ring with French hall-mark of 1838, a diamond, value about eight hundred dollars, two and a half carats. Schmitt burglary. Instant answer. Repeat message."

Serena wrote as he dictated.

"Read it aloud. . . . That will do.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

Now put on your wraps and take that telegram yourself to the nearest station. Take your maid. Give the operator five dollars, and promise five more for an immediate answer. Wait for it. Go out the back way. I will amuse our guest. Tell the police outside to wait. If the reply is as it should be, send them away. They will understand."

She read over the telegram, repeated her cousin's directions, and left at once.

XIII

“AND now,” said John, “a moment.” He came closer, put the pistol to the man’s head, and with his left hand extracted a revolver from the breast pocket of the thief’s coat. He let it fall into his own pocket, and said: “Sit down; drop your hands; you must be tired. Let us talk. What is your name? Any alias will do. I want a convenient handle.”

“Don’t know what for. Hall, Joe Hall, will do.” He was angry and sullen.

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"What 's your special line of business? I take it Miss Vernon's purse was a little side sport. The moral is, Keep to your own line; don't speculate. By the way, have you kept that purse?"

"Yes; I use it myself. I 'll chuck it into the bargain. Money 's gone, of course. There 's a queer penny; it 's in it now. Oh, come to think, my gal tried a receipt there was. Pretty nigh pizened me. Ain't been the same man since. You can have the purse."

"Put the purse on that chair."
He did so. "Variety of knowledge is of value in all the professions, Mr. Hall."

"What?"

A COMEDY OF CONSCIENCE

"Well, that luck-penny is worth about one hundred dollars; a rare coin."

"Gosh! I missed it, did n't I?"

"Yes, you did. Suppose we talk. We have two or three hours. If you are not lying you are safe."

"I was on the square, by —"

"We can't sit here for an hour or two in silence. Don't swear, not here at least. Tell me your biggest burgle."

What followed was sufficiently entertaining, and would have set up in detective and anti-detective crime literature a dozen small story-tellers. Joe, beginning to feel safe, was flattered and at last fluent. John was delighted — appreciative of the joy of risks.

"If you were to put all this cleverness into some regular, honest work — why not, Mr. Hall?"

"Would n't be any fun in it."

"No, I see. Pray go on."

"Well, shall I tell you how I stole the — well, no good to name them — the pearls last year, and what came of it?" He laughed, now quite at ease.

"A good story," said John.

"There is a better one."

"What 's that?"

"Oh, about the watermelon bank. Tom Crocker, he used to keep all his money in a watermelon. And Tom's grandmother, she give away that watermelon to —"

At this moment Serena, red and handsome, returned breathless.

"It's all right," she cried; "he told the truth. Here is the telegram; read it."

"DETECTIVE OFFICE, POLICE HEAD-QUARTERS, NEW YORK.

"Hold thief if you have him.

"Not I," said John.

"Oh, no," said Serena.

"Description correct. Any clue to the ruby bracelet?"

Joe grinned. "I did n't drop that in the bag, sir."

"No. Police gone, Serena?"

"There are none."

"Never were," said John.

"Euchred all round," said Joe.

"Now, my man," said John, "you may go. Your story will never be finished. This is very like compounding a felony — but Miss Vernon is averse to publicity.”

“Me, too,” said Joe, much relieved. “Never told a lie in my life.”

“Until now,” said John. “Get out of this.”

“Good night, sir”; and Joe, accompanied to the door by John, departed in great haste.

JOHN came back. It was ten o'clock. "Rena," he said, "you may now comfortably rock to sleep that uneasy, over-educated conscience. You want a care-taker, Rena; you must have been born an orphan. How I am to settle with the New York police is past my comprehension."

"John, I am, as always, in your debt."

"Then pay," he said.

"I cannot; I never can."

"Try; an effort at honesty is always possible, even for the most depraved."

"What can I do, John?"

"You know well enough."

"Yes," she said, looking him full in the eyes, a little flushed, a look of tender sadness in the face lines. "I—I cannot pretend to misunderstand you. I—I have liked you ever since we were children. I know how great, how undeserved, is all your love and patience, but—"

"But what, Rena?"

"Oh, I—I am not sure, and—not to be sure would be unjust, wicked. It is such a—I cannot."

"Say will not, Rena."

“ But I do not want to say that. It seems hard. It is always you who are good and helpful, and it is I who have no way to thank you.”

“ But there is a way.”

“ Yes, I know, I know. I — I can't, John.”

Then John Winterbourne bent over her and took her hand and caressed it with a light touch of his own, and said : “ Well, my dear Rena, never mind me. Unless it is to make you also happy, as I should be, I do not want you to say ‘ Yes.’ Either you care for — no, love me, or you do not ; and if not, let us go on as we have done. It is only one more disappointment. Were the ducks good, Rena?"

"Oh, John, when — how can you! When I am hurt, troubled, because I cannot — to talk — about — about ducks."

"Then damn the ducks!"

"John!"

"Suppose you go to bed, Rena; you are nervous."

"I never was nervous in my life."

"Your eyes are red."

"They are not."

"Go to bed, dear. May I smoke here? Where is your last 'Spectator'?"

There was in this cold ending of an imminent love-scene something which Rena felt to be harsh and unfit. She cared most truly for this man, and knew, too, he was acting in order to set her at ease. She moved toward the door. Then she turned and said :

"I do not like, John, to be always weighed down with debt. Things cannot go on as they have done."

"My dear Rena, you can send the scale flying and make me the abject, hopeless debtor. One word, dear — no, three."

"I cannot. Indeed I cannot. "Good night, John." She left the room. He heard her footfall on the stairs, heard the sound of windows closed and of bolts shot.

The servants had gone to bed; the house was still.

John Winterbourne lighted a cigar and sat down. He read no journal; a half-hour went by. He sat up of a sudden. Was that Rena?
He went out into the dark hallway. Then he heard Rena's voice out of the gloom overhead:

"John!"

"What is it, Rena? Anything wrong?"

"No."

"What the deuce is it?"

"Nothing. You don't think those burglars could —"

"Dear child! It is not eleven Go to bed."

"Good night, Cousin John.
—I want to say something—cannot—"

"Very good, dear. I will come up."

"No, please not. You must not, John."

"Oh, all right. What is it Won't it keep?"

"Please to go away before I come down to-morrow."

"By George! Really! Certainly, Rena. 6 A.M.?"

"John!" This was very low.

"Well?"

"I think I love you."

"Oh, Rena!"

"And come back to dinner
John."
